

Levels K-Z

Dear Parents,

Research has shown that children make the most progress in reading when they read books that are on their level and read every day (Allington, McGill-Franzen). A book that is the 'just right' level provides work for the reader, but not so much work that the reader loses the ability to maintain comprehension. By reading 'just right' books, readers learn what comprehension feels like and will then seek that level of understanding whenever he/she reads.

In order to determine which books are 'just right' for students and to inform instructional levels, teachers in Darien formally assess your child's reading multiple times across the year. In order to do this, teachers measure accuracy, fluency and comprehension. This means that the teacher tracks how many words your child was able to read in a leveled passage. Then, the teacher listens for how smoothly your child reads. (Smooth reading means that a child reads in phrases instead of word by word and that the listener can determine when a character is speaking.) Finally, the teacher ask questions to figure out how well your child understood the passage. What was the sequence? What was inferred? The result of the assessment is a reading level.

To support parents with the understanding of what each level entails, we have included a complete description for each one. Also provided is a list of titles by level in a variety of genres. To determine the reading level of any specific book, just google the title and 'guided reading level' and usually the level will be listed.

This packet covers levels K to Z. When students read higher level books, there is less of a distinct difference between each level. Instead, there are some similar challenges for readers that go across a few levels. These next pages will review those challenges in detail. This is not to say, however, that if a child is reading at one level, they can jump to another level with similar challenges. It simply means that there is specific skill and strategy work that layers across reading levels as books become more complex.

See below for levels that are grouped together by the kinds of challenges that they present to readers.

- K/L/M
- N/O/P/Q
- R/S/T
- U/V

Happy Reading!

Cory Gillette, Literacy Program Coordinator cgillette@darienps.org

Work Called For in K/L/M Leveled Texts

- Plot

Plot is very simple. The character makes multiple attempts to solve the problem, but they usually get what they want. Readers need to be able to recognize those attempts. Also, when reading in a series at this level, readers should start to figure out the predictable plot structure of every book in the series. For example, in the Rainbow Fairies Series they always find the fairy at the beginning, they always battle the goblins in the middle and they are always successful in the end.

- Character

Readers need to be able to identify how the main character's feelings change across the book.

There is not an internal change inside the character, but instead his/her feelings change.

Readers also should be reading many books in a series at this level so that they can accumulate a lot of information about the main character. That is, they should carry the information they learned about the character in one book to the next book. The supportive structure of books at this level is that the characters do not change across the series. They are the same in each book.

- Central Problem

There is one central problem in the book that is consistent throughout book. Readers have to be able to hold onto that problem across multiple chapters. Readers may also have to recognize that there are some smaller problems that are solved quickly, as compared to the central problem that goes across the entire text.

- Tricky

At these levels there are words that are unknown to the reader, but the larger context of what is going on should support the reader in figuring out the meaning of the words they do not know.

Work Called For in N/O/P/Q Leveled Texts

- Plot

In books at these levels there is more than one problem and there are social issues (poverty, loss, family issues) that are connected to the central problem. Readers at this level have a lot more work to do to maintain comprehension. The plot structure is also more complicated because mostly characters do not get what they want. Also, there may not be one clear problem, but instead multiple issues that the character encounters.

- Character

Now characters are changing internally from the beginning to the end of the book. Readers have to be able to predict when and how this will happen. Readers also have to figure out the kind of people their characters are because the books no longer tell them explicitly.

- Tricky

The tricky part in these levels, in addition to tricky parts to previous levels, tends to be the high amount of figurative language. That is, readers can get stuck on, or miss, figurative language because they can read the words but they don't take the time to figure out the meaning of the phrase and how it fits into the text they are reading. For example, the phrase 'it is raining cats and dogs' should slow a reader down to figure out what exactly that means.

Work Called For in R/S/T Leveled Texts

- Plot

Now the reader has to handle multiple plot lines, know how to keep track of them and how to adjust comprehension when a book is told from multiple perspectives.

- Character

Now the reader has to get to know the minor character as well as the main character. The reader has to figure out who the minor character is and why they are in the book. They have to figure out how the book would be different if that character was not there.

- Tricky

In addition to all of the other tricky issues from previous levels, now books at this level have pages that may not make sense. Readers can't use their old strategies of rereading and now have to apply new strategies to fix up comprehension. That may include reading on to figure out.

- Setting

Now setting plays a role in the story. Setting can act as another character; mimic the feelings of the character and it can be the cause of the major struggle or connected to it. The reader has to figure out what the role is and how the setting is effecting the story.

- Symbolism & Metaphor

Symbolism and metaphor are introduced and repeated throughout the story. Readers have to figure out what objects or ideas might stand for something else. In these books there is a lot of repetition so readers have many opportunities to notice metaphor.

Work Called For in U/V/ Leveled Texts

- Plot

Sometimes called "Tragic injustices" the plot does not follow the Disney plot line. Things are not always good at the end. Stories continue to be layered with multiple social issues. Readers need to predict differently in books of the difficulty due to the plot changes. There are also multiple problems and solutions that are connected to different themes.

- Character

Many characters change, not just the main character. Readers need to be able to recognize that the characters in these books are complex. It is hard to pin down exactly who this character is. Sometimes the character may seem one way, and other times they may seem totally different.

- Tricky

Readers may have a sense something is going on, but may not quite understand what it is. They have to 'hold onto it' and read on to figure out what it really is. Readers should have Ohhh...that's what that was! or Ohhh...now I get it! moments as they read forward.

Description of W/X/Y/Z

- Notably complex
- Many employ a postmodern structure in which multiple genres are included, multiple voices heard
- Perspectives overlap and conflict
- Whole chapters jump back in time
- Take risks with form and genre
- Usually use complex structure to convey ideas
- Books include the idea that our lives and the world defy any attempt to be pinned down or pigeonholed
- Books include the idea that it is not easy to communicate and understand each other
- Readers need to be willing to figure things out while reading
- Readers expected to have and draw upon a lot of knowledge of the world and other books
- Literary references are not essential to understanding the characters, but greatly enhance the reading experience if they are understood
- Readers expected to like challenging books, often set up like puzzles
- Content is often inappropriate for children below fifth grade
